In the last few years, there has been a significant decline in the percentage of people who say they believe in God, pray daily, and regularly attend church or other religious services. According to Pew Research Center, the decline in religious affiliation has been most pronounced among young adults. While the reasons for this decline are multifaceted, they include factors such as increased exposure to diverse worldviews and a greater emphasis on personal autonomy and self-expression.

However, the question of whether the American public is becoming less religious is not as straightforward as it might seem. The term “less religious” is subjective and can be interpreted in various ways. Some might argue that the decline in formal religious affiliation is a sign of a more secular society, while others might see it as a reflection of a more diverse and individualistic culture.

Regardless of how one defines “religious,” it is clear that the landscape of religion in the United States and around the world is changing. As we continue to witness these changes, it is important to consider the implications for individuals, communities, and society as a whole. Whether one views these changes as a cause for concern or as a sign of progress, it is clear that the field of religious studies is becoming increasingly relevant and important to understand the complex dynamics of faith and belief in the modern world.
